The ban is intended to reduce the injuries and deaths caused by reckless riding. But the sweeping ruling has forced new business models for e-scooter companies, which are struggling to survive. Luxembourg has banned the use of electric scooters by citizens of the small European country, and it is the first country to do so. In a country known for its progressive laws, this sounds like a bold move. But the ban is meant to reduce the injuries and deaths caused by reckless riding — an unintended consequence of e-scooter companies rolling out their shareable, dockless, pedal-less scooters across cities around the globe. The ban in Luxembourg has impacted companies that have gone to extreme lengths to make the experience of using their scooters as safe as possible. The ban is actually pushing scooter companies to roll out a new, safer business model, according to Josh Alpert, who founded Lime, the leading e-scooter company in the US. "I think that what the impact of the regulation is, is a clear sign that this [business model] doesn't work well with the public," he said. In response to the ban, Lime took steps to build a better business model. Lime has started rolling out a business model it calls "bike-share on wheels." The company is launching dockless bikes in 600 cities in the US that are meant to be shared through the app. This business model, Lime said, is less risky to the public, but still delivers the same scooter service. Alpert said the company expects to be in about 150 cities by the end of the year. "The bikes are going to be available for all riders. We're not going to discriminate based on the age of the rider," Alpert said. "We are going to have bikes available to adult riders, to teenagers, to kids, to seniors. We want them all to have access to the bike." Lime is also offering a bike
